SOMETHING WORTH WHILE

Mr. Editor :

Will you permit me to draw your readers' attention to the privilege that the citizens of Napanee and the surrounding country will be have extended to them by the forthcoming Chautauqua. We frequently hear the comment that the many disadvantages in living in a small town like Napanee is that we have few or no opportunities of hearing first-class music, celebrated lecturers and well staged theatrical performances. It was for the purpose of supplying this need that Chautauqua was organized. It is not an uncommon occurrence for citizens of our town to spend inconvenience and money to go to Kingston to hear a good concert or to enjoy an opera or play and they themselves feel fortunate if they are not out of pocket three or four dollars. By means of the Chautauqua we have brought to our doors eleven different programmes each of a superior order and a season ticket admitting any member of a family costs only $2.75. It is not at all unusual to hear the remark that a single programme is worth the amount paid for the whole eleven. Anyone purchasing a season ticket is making a good investment if he does not attend more than one half of the entertainments. It is difficult to estimate the educative value of the annual Chautauqua. There is a refined and intellectual atmosphere which accompanies it which cannot fail to make its influence felt. It should require no argument to convince every public spirited citizen that he owes it to himself, to his family and the community to encourage the Chautauqua by purchasing one or more season tickets. We each have a duty to perform for it is such an immense undertaking that its success can only be assured through the hearty co-operation of all classes. What more sensible present to some needy friend than a week of intellectual pleasure of the highest order !

We are two prone when living in a small town to get into narrow grooves. Here is an opportunity for us to broaden out and enlarge our vision of the real riches of life." May we hope, Mr. Editor, that our friends in the country will join with the townspeople in making this Chautauqua the best ever held in Napanee ?

Yours truly,

W. S. HERRINGTON.

TAMWORTH.

A very sad affair occurred here on Sunday last, when the seventeen-months old son of Reggie Adair was drowned. The child wandered to the river and fell in. The body was recovered and the funeral took place on Tuesday to Christ church. The family have the sincere sympathy of a large circle of friends. Tom Adair, Oshawa, was here for the funeral.

Yarker defeated Tamworth at baseball by a score of 27 to 26.

Mrs. Aylesworth is visiting friends in Kingston.

Miss Jones is visiting friends in Toronto.

Rev. Mr. Clark is home from attending the summer school at Peterboro.

W. J. Shire's general store was broken into about two o'clock on Tuesday morning. Entrance was secured by breaking the large pane of glass in the front door. The safe was also broken into and about $28 in cash was taken. Some goods were also removed and the thief or thieves scattered goods all over the floor. The post office was also entered about the same time on Tuesday morning. Entrance was secured by cutting a hole over the bolt at the back door. About $3.50 was taken.

Miss E. Floyd is visiting friends in Kingston.

D. Devire, Rochester, N.Y., was a recent visitor here.

"Gretchen of Holland" to Be Presented at Chautauqua

"Gretchen of Holland," notable musical production presented with special scenery and costumes, will be a feature of a grand concert to be given at the coming Dominion Chautauqua by the well-known Montague Light Opera Singers.

Incidental solos, duets and quartets from the best song literature lend pleasing variety to the Montagues' offerings. One or more readings, such as a scene from Barrie's "Quality Street," give further diversion without departing from the superior quality of the program.

The Montague Light Opera Singers are known almost the country over. Under the leadership of John Eichenberger, tenor, they have achieved a notable place in the Chautauqua field.

$30,000 In Jewels Stolen.

MONTREAL, May 21.—Precious stones to the value of $30,000 were stolen Friday night from the offices of J. L. Sabbath and Co., Notre Dame street west, wholesale jewelers, by thieves who entered the premises and blew open a safe with nitro-glycerine. The burglars obtained entry into the Sabbath building by a false key.

This is the second time this firm has been robbed. In April, 1922, thieves broke into its office and secured jewels valued at $10,000. Most of the stolen stones were found in Toronto.

BAROTSELAND.

An African Tribe Where Men Do Women's Work.

Like most African tribes, the Barotse have their peculiar customs. Some of these customs are referred to by Mr. D. W. Strike, Native Commissioner, Northern Rhodesia, in his recently published book "Barotseland."

The Barotse "Kotla," or parliament, it may be stated without making any invidious comparison, "sits daily." There is also the Chief's Privy Council, the "Sikalu," which sits in two shifts, by night and by day. Privacy is carried almost to extremes, since "conversation is held entirely in whispers."

In the parliament the "junior member of each division speaks first," and the "Ngambela," or Prime Minister, winds up the debate. Agreement is signified by clapping hands. When a matter is settled "word is sent to the chief, who sends word back by the same man as to his approval or otherwise." In the event of disapproval the prime minister "goes to the chief and explains the matter and urges his acceptance of the ruling of the Kotla." It all sounds rather like our own parliamentary manœuvres in the time of, say, George the Third.

"Triplets," says Mr. Strike, "are very rare and are considered bad. One is killed and two left alive, the reason being that the mother has only two breasts."

The usual division of labor between the sexes is reversed among the Alunda tribe. "These people will often admit they are the slaves to their womenfolk," says Mr. Strike. "The average Lunda woman's daily work is fishing, which they do by wading along the sides of streams, pushing a large wicker basket in front of them. The Alunda men use the hoe as well as the axe, and tend their gardens, grind meal for porridge, plaster their huts, and do all the work that is generally supposed by other African tribes to be women's work only."

If very close relatives in Barotseland meet, in addition to shaking and kissing hands, they "spray each other with spittle." Men seldom eat with their wives, as a man who does so is considered greedy, on the principle that being stronger than his wife he will "grab the largest and best portions."

A remarkable fact about the Barotse language is that it is to-day an "almost artificially manufactured tongue which had come into existence during the last fifty years—Sikolo." The real Sirezi or Silozi language—which the original Bechwana invaders of a hundred years ago brought with them—is, Mr. Strike says, "gradually dying out, and to-day is known to but a few of the blood royal, sons of indunas (officers of state) and the like."

"The King's Journalist."

Mr. J. G. Muddiman has written the life of his ancestor, Henry Muddiman, who founded the London Gazette in 1655, under the title of "The King's Journal, 1660-1689." The book throws fascinating sidelights upon a period of English history which has never yet been fully explored, and upon the real beginnings of English journalism. Muddiman's "News-Letters," from 1667 to 1689, the MSS. of which have been at Longleat, Wiltshire, since 1714, have been carefully examined. Mr. Muddiman compares the life of a journalist of those far-off days with that of the present. "A remarkable route and," he writes, "to a modern editor journeying to his daily work by the underground railway was presented by the swigged seventeenth century newswriter, mounted on horseback and travelling to Whitehall 'or the Seven Stars' in the Strand, armed with a sword and a brace of pistols in his holster, because of the footpads at Knightsbridge.'"

Venice is built on eighty islands, has four hundred bridges.

Here and There

Shipments over the T. and N. O. Railway during the month of May amounted to 329.15 tons of silver ore.

The movements of the mackerel schools will, when observed, be broadcasted from radio apparatus erected for the purpose by the Canadian Marine Department.

Mrs. Dan Otto, of Stratford, Ont., set 33 eggs and hatched 34 ducklings from them. One nest was apparently of the double yolk variety and both yolks were hatched.

A new direct passage service between Canada and northern Ireland has been inaugurated by the Canadian Pacific Steamships, Ltd. Three steamers have been assigned to the route.

James Edwards, of Port Robinson, declares he has a chicken out of this year's hatch which out-freaks most chicken freaks. This one has four legs, four wings, two backs, two necks but only one head. It has been preserved in alcohol.

One hundred and fifty families are to be brought into British Columbia and settled under private enterprise in the valleys east and south-east of Fort George, W. A. Lewthwaite announced, following his return from England recently.

A Swedish scientist claims to have perfected a process for the manufacture of "artificial wood from 50 per cent. sawdust and the balance chalk and chemicals. The product is as hard as oak, and can be planed, sawed, bored, nailed, painted, stained or polished. It will not deteriorate in water.

A start on the actual work of electrifying sections of the Canadian Pacific Railway's main line through the Rockies may be made next year. D. C. Coleman, vice-president of western lines, says that traffic demands and financial conditions would determine when a start would be made.

The decision of the Government of the province of Quebec to grant a bonus of $4 per acre for land cleared will result in an approximate outlay of $250,000. Clearance in the past three years has amounted to approximately 40,000 annually, but the total this year is expected to be 60,000 or more.

Speaking to the Canadian Club in London, Eng., recently, E. W. Beatty, President of the Canadian Pacific Railway, contrasted the "spiritating tortoise-like slowness" of Canada's population policy with Australia's progressiveness. "We Canadians would be wise to throw the gates open for brains as well as brawn," he said.

One hundred and fifty delegates of the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association will tour the British Isles next summer, and hold their annual convention in London, according to decisions reached at the final meeting of the convention here. The party will leave about the first of June, and will attend the British Empire Exhibition. The tour will last about six weeks.

Up to the end of 1922 dividends paid by the gold and silver mines of northern Ontario amounted to over $123,135,000. Cobalt camp was discovered late in 1903 and hardly began producing until 1905. Dividends paid out of Cobalt mines amount to $93,863,820, which represents practically 50 per cent. of the gross value of production. Porcupine mines have paid $28,472,988.

George E. Buchanan, of Detroit, head of the "On to Alaska with Buchanan" movement, will take 52 boys and 24 adults or members of the boys' families when he personally conducts his party from Vancouver July 18 via Canadian Pacific "Princess" steamer. Buchanan thinks, with President Harding, that a trip to Alaska is a liberal education to any boy who takes it. He puts up one-third of the expense, the boy earns one-third and the boy's parents put up the remaining third.

World's Wealthiest People.

Which is the wealthiest race in the world, reckoning the average income per head or population?

There is no doubt that in the near future the Osage Indians, numbering 2,000, and living in Oklahoma, in America, will enjoy this distinction. Oil has been discovered on their territory, and, with the permission of the United States Government, they are selling the land to a company for five million dollars down and a sixth of the profits on all the oil produced there.

Two thousand tribesmen will share the proceeds of this transaction, and each will receive an annual income of $10,000, which is higher than the average income in any other country.

The Vanishing Farm.

"The Big Town," said the Cornfactor, "is only 40 miles away."

"That ought to make it easier for you to market the products of your farm."

"I want you to understand that this ain't no farm. This here is suburban real estate."

Whaling on Pacific Coast

The leviathan of the mighty deep, sporting ponderously in the grey-green waters off the British Columbia coast, is a poor instance risk these days.

The whaling fleet has sailed silently out of Victoria Harbor, and great strips of sea off the west coast of Vancouver Island, and away up north around the Queen Charlotte Islands, are being patrolled by the ships of the Consolidated Whaling Corporation, Limited.

Out of the deep a great bulk rises to spout.

Immediately the lynx-eyed look-out gives the old, old cry of warning:

"Thar she blo—ows, blo—ows!"

"What away?"

"Ha' point on th' port bow, sir!"

Or whatever happens to be the correct direction.

The harpooner, standing by his Svend Foyn gun, marks the spot, notes the direction in which the whale is travelling, waits a few seconds, then shoots his harpoon at a spot 150 yards straight ahead of where the whale disappeared. Whale and harpoon get there about the same time, and the first step in the interesting process of reducing the giant animal to oil, fertilizer, and metal has been taken.

In the old days a great whaling armada sailed out of San Francisco. Some of them followed their way through the iron bergs and icy spangles of the Arctic, some scoured the level spaces from California to the Hawaiian Islands, others again set sail for the beach settlements from Papeete to Marotonga. And some, bolder in their quest of gain, threaded their perilous course down the East Asian coast into the sacred waters of Japan itself.

It was a great industry in those days! Whalebone in its prime brought as high as $15 a pound, and fancy prices could always be got for sperm oil, then the finest lubricant to be got. The owners, outfitters and skippers of the scores of whaling vessels coined money, while the mates, skilled harpooners, and those of the crew who were experienced were paid big wages. "Green" hands usually finished the season richer in experience only, but little they had earned going into the "slop chest." They made no complaint; a few months or sea with the hard-bitten mates and captains had taught them the futility of this.

The South Coast knows the whalers no more. There is but one whaling station on the American Pacific coast, at Bay City, Washington, and even that one reports its catch to Victoria!

British Columbia has four whaling stations, two on Vancouver Island, and two on the Queen Charlottes.

The whaling fleet consists of eight vessels, of 100 tons equipped with 350-horse power engines, and carrying a crew of eleven men. The hunt is carried on from close to shore to as far out as thirty or forty miles.

Certainly, the glory of the whaling industry has diminished, and soon may have departed. How has this come to pass?

The blame rests chiefly on John D. Rockefeller and the changing styles in women's corsets and umbrella ribs.

When Mr. Rockefeller set out to pile up a huge fortune for himself out of oil, he tapped underground reservoirs that yielded precious fluid by the million gallons. The sulphur bottom whale, unable to produce more than 150 barrels of oil, was clearly out of the running. The humpback, with its fifty barrels, and the bottlenose, with its pittance of seven barrels, were not even competitors.

John D. fixed the price of oil to suit himself, and so long as he kept it at a low figure the whalers could not operate except at a heavy loss. One by one the blackened, grease-smelling vessels disappeared. The industry was apparently a thing of the past.

Then, in 1906, British Columbia opened its first whalery at Sechart Station. The following year Kyuquot Station got going. It is still the most important of the four stations, though Naden Harbor, on the Queen Charlottes, had one more whale to its credit in 1922.

Rockefeller is not interested in the B.C. whaleries, but the whaleries are tremendously interested in Rockefeller. On the price of oil depends the important question of profit or loss, and Standard Oil controls that.

In 1921, owing to the low price of oil, the B.C. whaling fleet remained tied up at the Victoria wharves all season. This meant unemployment for over one hundred men, and the loss of products which in 1920 were worth $435,746, and the previous year $648,868.

Last year a total of 186 whales were slaughtered, yielding 301,800 gallons of oil, 250 tons of fertilizer and 224 tons of meal. In the three previous operating years, the catch was more than twice as large, and indications are that this season will be much more profitable than that of 1922.

Whale meat was canned in 1918, when 29,585 cases were put up. Most of this was exported to Japan, where the natives are said to like it.

Depending largely upon the market price of oil, an average whale is worth from $750 to $1,500.

The Consolidated Whaling Corporation of British Columbia hunts sperm (sometimes called the Cachalot), sulphur bottom, humpback, finback, California gray, and Sei whales.

Situation Grave in N. B.

FREDERICTON, N. B., June 25.—There is no cessation of the forest fire menace in this province, and in a statement given out to-day Hon. W. C. Robinson, Minister of Lands and Mines, says that the situation is very grave. No word has been received since Saturday from Rocky Gulch, about ten miles from Campbellton, in Restigouche county.

At latest reports the village was threatened with destruction. One of the most serious fires is now situated in a heavily timbered and very dry forest area, to the southwest of the Miramichi river.

Unconventional Memories

Some Well-known People

Stran e Foibles of Shah

A story of the "Jubilee Juggins," a young man who earned his nickname in the Jubilee year, when he was busily squandering a quarter of a million pounds, is told by Mr. Ralph Neville in "Unconventional Memories."

On one occasion some rogues locked the door of the billiard-room at a certain resort, and kept him playing half the night, until he had lost ten thousand pounds. "Friends" battened upon him to such an extent that once the porter at another sporting resort, answering a query for "the Jubilee," replied: "The beagles and the vultures are 'ere, but the carcass h'aint come yet."

Of late Dr. Wolff, who spent a long time in Abyssinia and many other places in religious pursuits, the author also tells a story. Dr. Wolff was said to have contracted careless habits during his travels.

On one occasion he was to pay a three-day visit to a country house, and before he went his wife packed three spotless shirts in his bag, telling him to put one on each evening.

"I hope you did as I told you," she said on his return.

"Of course I did, my dear," was the reply. "I put on a clean shirt every evening, one on top of the other. I am wearing all four now!"

Mr. Neville was for a time attaché at the British Legation in the Persian capital—Teheran—and he tells some anecdotes about the then Shah, Nasr-ed-din.

In 1879 the Shah paid a visit to London, and was housed in Buckingham Palace. One of the Persians whose duty it was to massage the Shah—this being the royal visitor's cure for sleeplessness—so infuriated his master by rudeness or incompetence that the Shah ordered him to be bow-strung in Buckingham Palace.

The man was executed on the spot, his body being taken out that night and buried in the palace gardens, where, in some unknown spot, it lies to-day.

Whether the story is true or not," the author adds, "I cannot say, but from what I know of the Persians of that day the incident is not improbable."

On one or two occasions at dinner functions, when some unusually fat lady was present (female obesity is or was esteemed a beauty in the east), the Shah would take off his spectacles, wipe them, and have a good look at her. After which he would address her through an interpreter, and inquire;—

"How many children have you got?"

If she replied that she was not married, the Shah would say: "Why not? A fine woman should have a husband. You had better get one as soon as you can."

The Shah had adopted as a mascot a child who, he believed, had indirectly saved his life. The boy was made a full general and given a uniform and a miniature diamond-hilted sword, as well as an army of boys to command. He had, also, a special suite of servants to look after him.

The boy was brought with the Shah to England. At a luncheon at the Guildhall the ill-mannered little fellow tried several times to put his hand in his neighbor's plate, ingloriously being aroused by seeing some morsel more tempting than any on his own.

At a Durbar at Asra, in honor of the Ameer of Afghanistan, when the bandmasters were instructed to play the Afghan National Anthem they declared that no one had ever heard of such a tune. Eventually the commander-in-chief (Lord Kitcener) was appealed to for instructions.

"It does not matter," Kitcener replied; "the Ameer does not know a note of music. Play two or three bars of something heavy, pompous, and slow—that's sure to please him!"

A march from one of the older German operas was played, with such success that the newspapers printed remarks about "the weirdly beautiful Oriental strains of the Afghan National Anthem."

All sorts of curious stories are circulated concerning Oriental potentates visiting London.

During the visit of the heir to the throne of Afghanistan in 1895, he was, according to one report, permitted by the downfall of the government. He at once ordered the use of his Afghan escort to protect the royal family!

He sent to a Bond street gunmaker for ammunition, and placed his house in a state of efficient defence, experience in his own country having taught him that when a government falls it is wise to be prepared for all eventualities.

Running British Railways.

Of all the British railways, before their amalgamations last January, the London and North-Western employed the greatest number of people —101,483. Next came the Great Western with 91,985, and the Midland with 81,731.

At the other end of the scale, amongst the companies deemed worthy of classification, were the Stratford-upon-Avon and Midland Junction Railway with a total staff all told of 317, and the Rhondda and Swansea Bay with 324.

The grand total of employes on the whole of the railways of the United Kingdom was, according to a recent Government return, 766,381, of which 737,946 were males and 28,435 females.

Amongst the latter, quite a considerable number were employed on work usually done by women—in England at all events.

There were, for example, four women "cranemen," five "engine cleaners," and thirteen "oilers and greasers," while one woman—on the North British Railway—took on the dangerous and arduous work of a "shunter."

There were, besides, twelve women signalmen, twenty station-mistresses, seven working foremen, and six railway policemen. No fewer than 93 women were employed as laborers, and 895 women and 165 girls are classed as "mechanics and artisans."

CANADA'S ACCENT.

What Sort of English Do We Speak?

Is there a Canadian accent? It is doubtful if even the rush of new citizens in the last generation or two has resulted in any individual expression that might be identified among other nationalities when melted down. Some discussion has taken place on the subject in United States papers recently. A Canadian, writing to the New York Herald, offered this opinion:

"The expressions and accent of the native British Canadian differ less from those of the cultured American than those of the New Englander differ from the accent of the Georgian or Texan. Americans, as a rule, cannot place a Canadian as such by the aid of any differences in phraseology. If there can be said to be a Canadian accent it is closer to that of the Scots than the English, and during an acquaintance of fifteen years with Americans from all sections of the United States I have noted the absence of the so-called American twang from the speech of the educated and successful citizens of this country."

The Boston Transcript has replied, suggesting the strong flavor of the Scottish in Canadian conversation. The Transcript writer says:

"Canadian English does not now differ in any respect from the English spoken by well-bred people in the Northeastern States of the American Union, and the Nomad has noticed that the Western Canadians from Manitoba and beyond. . . . We what we call the 'Western' drawl. It is true that many Canadians will advance in years speak with a strong suggestion of the Scottish accent, but the "cockney" English exists in Canada only as it may exist here—in the motmitts, that is, of people who have brought it from England. The nasal twang, the broad sound of "ow"—as in "crowd" "out" in loud"—is indeed quite as rare in the west of England as it has to our ears a queerly clipped compressed sound. It serves to give a Nova Scotian, it he happens to express it, which is not always the case. But it is a trifling difference, and does not alter the case that the 'Canadian accent' and the American accent are now substantially one and the same thing.

The Standard of Comparison

Reflecting the Spirit of the Great Out-of-Doors

WHAT man or woman who loves the great out-of-doors does not thrill when spinning along the road in a McLaughlin-Buick? For it is something more than merely a wonderfully fine automobile. Unconsciously, it is thought of as a cherished outing companion, responsive both to mood and occasion.

Nor are its distinctive appearance, dashing beauty and spirited performance the sole reasons for the owner's pleasure. One would scarcely be human did one fail to take delight in the admiring glances which one's car attracts, whether in the down town district, fashionable street or at the country club.

The modern method of selling

by Long Distance

The history of material progress is based on substituting non-fatiguing machinery for human labor, wherever possible.

No merchants in the world have ready to their hands such an extraordinary aid to making sales as is afforded by the Long Distance lines in Canada and the United States.

"Men differ," said Charles Darwin, the great scientist, "less in capacity than in their determination to use the powers they have."

Are you deriving the fullest advantage from Long Distance service? We can make you a report on how Long Distance is being used successfully in almost any business to increase sales.

Historical Research for The Dominion

Wm. Webber, Montreal, Marquis of Sligo, Captain E. Griffiths, R.N.R., "Empress of France," Marchioness of Sligo.

AFTER a two-year holiday, completing a mileage of 46,000 miles on Canadian Pacific railway and steamships, the Marquis and Marchioness of Sligo returned to their London home. During their stay in the Western hemisphere, the Irish peer diverted from his main course of travel, visiting all the leading cities of South America and in the latter days of his travel diverted his course to Southern China, where he narrowly escaped by some few minutes being taken by bandits.

Prior to his departure on the S.S. "Empress of France," the distinguished visitor forwarded to the Canadian Government an interesting document found in the Sligo family correspondence, being a letter from the Hon. Henry Bruyne, who was associated with the capture of Quebec.

For some time past, the Marquis has been occupied in gathering data about his family and the part they played in the history of Canada and the Dominion is to reap the benefit of his research. The Marquis began his researches with the famous picture of the death of Wolfe, by West, and after careful investigation he has succeeded in identifying a number of the individuals who surrounded the general as he lay on the ground. Chief among these is Lt. Henry Browne who was the standard bearer in the Louisburg Grenadiers which fought on the right of the line in Wolfe's army. In the picture the Lieutenant is shown holding the standard. Later, according to evidence gathered by the Marquis, his ancestor helped to carry the general off the battlefield after he had died.

Col. W. J. Malley Died Suddenly In Toronto.

Lieut.-Col. W. J. Malley, mayor of Deseronto, and a prominent man in that town for many years, died very suddenly in Toronto on Thursday night. He suffered an attack of apoplexy. The late Col. Malley was sixty-seven years of age and had been a resident of Deseronto for thirty-eight years. He was druggist and had a shop there. He served one term as mayor, and had only filled his position a few months on a second term, having been elected following the death of Mayor Dalton, who also died following a stroke of apoplexy. Deceased was a member of Craig Lodge, A. F. & A.M., Deseronto, and was also a member of Kingston Lodge of Perfection, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. Col. Malley was a leading member of the old 5th Kingston Battery. He is survived by his wife and two sons, Claire, in the drug store at Deseronto, and Arthur in the Customs department, at present relieving at Belleville.

Collegiate Institute.

The number of successful pupils at the recent High School Entrance Examination points to a large attendance at the Collegiate Institute next year. The fact that pupils in Collegiate Inst.-sites and High Schools are awarded Lower School standing on the recommendation of the staff will also tend to bring more candidates for Lower School standing to the Collegiate Institute. In order that the classes in the Collegiate Institute may be organized before the school opens all pupils, both old and new, expecting to attend in September, are requested to send their names to the principal, Dr. Morden. New pupils are requested also to give their ages and whether the course selected will be matriculation, teachers or general. In order that the Middle School work may be properly organized, it is absolutely necessary that pupils intending to commence Middle School work, that is those promoted from Form II, should especially notify the Principal.

P. A. SHIPYARD OFFICE-MAN DIES SUDDENLY.

As suddenly as the last great summons can come to any man, death came last Thursday to Garnet W. Cox, accountant and assistant treasurer, Port Arthur Shipbuilding company.

Mr. Cox, who was noticed by friends and acquaintances to be apparently in his usual good health about eight-thirty that morning, boarded a street car about 8.45 for the dry docks. He entered the office door, and, while in the vestibule, on the threshold of his own office, fell to the floor and expired instantly, death occurring at five minutes to nine.

The remains were removed to Morris' undertaking parlors, where Coroner Brown viewed the body and decided that an inquest was unnecessary.

Garnet Wolseley Cox was 43 years and 11 months old, and was born at Enterprise, Ont. He was engaged in clerical work with Mackenzie and Mann in western Canada on the Northern Pacific railway construction work before coming to Port Arthur, where he served fourteen years, also in work in the freight department of the Canadian National railway.

One year later, in 1910, construction began on the big plant of the Western Dry Dock and Shipbuilding company, as it was then called. Garnet Cox at once became identified with the plant with which during the rest of his life he was so intimately associated, and where his career was brought to a sudden end in such and unexpected and tragic manner. Death found him at his post, ready for the duties of work of another day, when he was called hence to a larger sphere of usefulness.

In addition to his widow, he is survived by his mother and one sister, living at the family home at Enterprise, Otis Gardner, Colonel Robert Cox, died at Enterprise about a year ago. R. S. Richardson, superintendent of the Canadian government railways is a cousin.

Always taking an interest in good, clean sport, he was mainly through the efforts of Garnet Cox that the Pasco Baseball and Athlethic Association was formed, of which he had been president for the past two years. He was at the time of his death one of the Port Arthur representatives on the executive of the Thunder Bay Amateur Baseball Association.

He was a member of Shuniah Lodge, No. 247, A. F. & A. M., and also of Port Arthur Lodge No. 244, I.O.O.F. By religious denomination he as an Anglican, and two years ago was a member of the select vestry of St. John's church. Mrs. Garnet Cox is an active worker in St. John's Women's guild.

In honor of the late Garnet Cox, the flag is flying at half mast over the offices of Port Arthur Shipbuilding Company.

Mrs. Cox, accompanied by a trained nurse, accompanied the remains to Enterprise where the funeral took place on Sunday afternoon. The floral offerings were very numerous and beautiful.

CATTLE MARKETS

TORONTO LIVE STOCK.

TORONTO, July 16.—Cattle receipts at the Union Stock Yards last week exceeded the offerings of the previous period by about 2,500 head, but despite this fact there was an excellent demand for all finished shipments at generally steady prices. Some of the commission men were of the opinion that more good to choice quality butcher cattle would have found a ready sale. The export trade was very quiet, but it is likely to show an improvement this week.

Most of the finished butcher cattle closed unchanged from the previous week's finish, with the bulk of the sales from $7.50 to $7.75. Some choice baby beeves brought from $8 to $8.50.

Cows were fairly plentiful and ranged from steady to strong last week. The bulk of the best sold from $5.25 to $6.75, with a few up to $6. Medium quality cows sold from $4 to $4.50, and common ones down to $3.25. The receipts of bulls were fairly heavy and prices moved lower owing to the lack of an export demand. Best bulls moved to from $5 to $5.50.

Hog prices strengthened late in the week to close 25c with selects bringing $9.45, fed and watered, and thick smooths $9.15. Packers are cutting the price for heavy and extra heavy hogs to $8 and $8.50 respectively, though hogs are being cut $1.50 and feeders $2.50 lower than a week ago.

Receipts of calves were considerably in excess of the previous week, but with a good demand from the local packers and speculators for the Buffalo market, the market closed strong for all classes; $10 was practically the top.

The offerings of sheep and lambs were also much heavier than the receipts in the previous period. The market at the opening ranged from steady to strong, but the heavy receipts caused a weakening by Wednesday. Most sales of the lighter marks were made from $15.50 to $16. At the end of the week the top price was $16.65, while thin lambs were selling from $10 to $12. Sheep prices were also easier. Yearlings sold from $8 to $10, but the bulk of the good ones ranged from $9 to $9.50. Heavy sheep culls and bucks sold from $2 to $2.40.

Receipts of live stock at the Union Yards for to-day's market are 364 cars; Cattle 264; calves 554, hogs 2,255 and sheep 1,911.

Heat In Europe.

BERLIN, July 16.—All windows closed from 9 p.m. until 7 in the morning, as the heat is unbearable in Essen and other Ruhr towns in a temperature of near 100 degrees now crushing Central Europe. In a heartrending appeal to the French generals, the Labor unions of the Ruhr has demanded permission to open windows at night and to allow street cars to run, since, under the present traffic restrictions, many workers walk for hours until they reach their jobs, and many casualties are caused by these superfluous exertions in the sweltering heat. They also ask that the telephones be freed, since doctors cannot be reached, even in the most serious and unexpected cases.

STRIKE NEARS CRISIS.

Dynamite and Violence Are Feared at Sydney.

SYDNEY, N.S., July 16.—There was no change in the strike situation in the Cape Breton area over the week-end, but there is apparently an increasing tension and an expectation that the week may be a critical time. The British Empire Steel Corporation miners in Cape Breton are standing fast, and a delegation speaking for them is now in Springhill endeavoring to induce the men there to change last week's decision to continue at work.

In Sydney the Steel Workers' Union, which decided on Friday to continue the strike, held a crowded meeting Sunday, at which speakers who talked of victory and denounced the Governments and the corporation were cheered to the echo.

No disorders occurred during the week-end beyond the looting of a provision store at Dominion No. 1, but in police circles it is stated that threats to blow up property with powder or dynamite from No. 2 colliery have been reported, as well as plans to attack power houses in various parts of the colliery field. Another report is of threats to tear up the rails of the Sydney & Louisburg Railway to prevent the further movement of coal from No. 2 bank into Sydney. As a result of these reports increased vigilance is being shown by the Provincial Police and the military, and new plans are being made to meet any situation that may arise.

An effort to bring out the roundhouse men of the Sydney & Louisburg Railway and the freight handlers with them is being made by the miners, but with what prospects of success is uncertain. The miners' chiefs are now in communication with A. R. Mosher, head of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employes, with a view to ascertaining the attitude of that organization, with which the freight handlers are connected, and in a endeavor to obtain the union support. Appeals for support are also being made to many other unions. From the miners' local at Timmins, Ont., a promise of $500 has been received.

DRURY IS UNCERTAIN.

Several Seats In Legislature Offered to Ex-Premier.

MILTON, Ont., July 16.—Friday night Milton was the scene of much activity among politicians, Conservatives and Liberals holding executive meetings, and the People's Political Association of Halton holding a general meeting to meet ex-Premier Drury.

The Liberals met in the G.W.V.A. rooms and talked over the political situation and transacted considerable business. The Conservatives met over Mackenzie's drug store and members state that it was without doubt the largest executive meeting ever held in Halton county, every section being represented. A great deal of important business was transacted.

Geo. Palmer, M.P.P., of Oakville, who defeated Premier Drury by 716 was present and got a wonderful reception. A resolution of confidence in Premier Ferguson was passed and carried with much enthusiasm.

The People's Political Association of Halton met in the Royal Building, which was packed to the doors with farmers and others, many not being able to gain admission. Ex-Premier Drury was present and delivered an address covering the recent political battle in Halton and the defeat of his Government last month. Mr. Drury stated among other things that he had not as yet fully made up his mind to re-enter the political arena or accept one of several offers of seats in other constituencies.

Although Mr. Drury tried hard to hide the sting of his defeat in Halton and the downfall of his Government, it was plainly visible that he felt his position keenly.

CANADA WILL BENEFIT.

Roumania Is Arranging to Pay Big War Debts.

MONS, July 16.—M. Bratiano, Roumanian Finance Minister, is now in London negotiating agreements with several Governments with regard to Roumania's trade and debt, and is also putting forward the true state of his country's resources.

"Until 1919 half of our country was occupied by Germany," Bratiano says, "while the other half bore the brunt of the war and the Roumanian revolution. The first three peace budgets naturally showed a deficit, but Roumania has proved that she can meet all her ordinary obligations, even though her resources, for the most part, still are far from having attained normality under the new conditions."

Owes Canada a Million.

OTTAWA, July 16.—A recent despatch from London set forth that the Roumanian Government had made arrangements to consolidate its foreign debts, and has set aside certain revenues for the purpose. It was announced that funds were available to cover interest payments now due and for two further instalments.

Canada's loan to Roumania, made in 1918, amounts to $1,009,595.

Killed Fish In River.

INGERSOLL, Ont., July 16.—For growing bolder with time and the water in the Thames river here, causing explosions for the purpose of obtaining fish, Andrew Young of West Oxford and Lloyd Rockett of Norwich were each fined $50 by Magistrate Patterson.

Local authorities, as well as Overseer Caldwell of the Game and Fisheries Department of London, have had their suspicion aroused for some time as to what was transpiring along the Thames near here. Large quantities of dead fish were to be observed almost daily, and it was rumored that dynamite was being used. An investigation was begun, and on Friday night Overseer Caldwell caught Young and Rockett in the act of throwing the "explosive" bottles into the river. Accused admitted throwing the bottles into the river Friday night, but denied that they had not committed previous offences.

HAD SKULL FRACTURED.

Strange Accident Caused by Exploding Automobile Tire.

INGERSOLL, Ont., July 16.—Struck in the forehead by a piece of metal, when an automobile tire exploded at Thamesford Saturday, Joseph Peters, of Toronto, had his skull fractured. Immediately after the accident the injured man was rushed to Alexandra Hospital here and operated upon to relieve pressure on the brain. While it was learned that Peters was conscious, his condition is regarded as extremely grave.

With his youngest son, 11 years old, Peters was motoring to London. When he was approaching Thamesford he had a blowout and stopped to have the tire repaired at a garage in the village. Soon after the tire had been inflated, Peters stooped to pick it up. It exploded as he reached for it and he received a terrible gash in the forehead by a fragment of the valve stem, a strip of the skull between two and three inches in length being crushed.

Tide Cut Off Retreat.

QUEBEC, July 16.—A double drowning occurred Sunday afternoon at Ste. Petronille, Island of Orleans, in which the victims were Mrs. A. Beland, of St. Adolphe de Dubsweil, Wolfe County, near Sherbrooke, and Frank Gagnon, of this city. The accident occurred while the two victims in company with Mr. and Mrs. John Deggan, and their sons were bathing in the St. Lawrence river. The tide was low when the party started to bathe and they had to go out far to reach the water. While they were bathing the tide started to rise and when they tried to regain the shore they got into deeper water and being unable to swim were drowned before aid could reach them.

Ruling After Fifty Years.

PARIS, July 16.—After considering the question for fifty-one years, the French courts have finally ruled that wife-beating is not legalized in France.

A domestic quarrel in May, 1872, resulted in a beating for a Parisian woman who immediately lodged a complaint with the authorities at Chambery. If the husband who did the beating were now alive he might in principle face a jail term. Both litigants are dead, however, but the Supreme Court of France ground out the decision just the same.

CANADA

Americans may well extend to the people across the northern frontier their heartiest congratulations on the healthy expansion of their country. There is and can be no jealousy in our hearts, for in the prosperity of the Dominion there is nothing for us but benefit.

It is real prosperity of the sort that in the forties and fifties was making the United States great. The country is filling up with immigrants of the best class, such as were then coming to the United States. The population is moving west and taking up land. The new Canada already furnishes much of the wheat on which the Old World depends.

Manufacturing too is doing for Canada what it did for us half a century or more ago. The transportation lines of the Dominion are already magnificent and are steadily improving. No other railway project was ever more daring than the building of a line through the wilderness almost at the northern limit of possible habitation, to the shores of Hudson Bay, to open for a few months of the year the shortest route from the grain fields of the West to European markets.

Canada is under free institutions—self-governed and well-governed. It has bred a body of public men of ability and high character. Americans may not appreciate the worldly wisdom that leads Canadians to cling to the British connection; but they can appreciate the sentiment behind their willingness to forego the last rights of complete sovereignty in their pride as a part of the British Empire, for of this there is no material profit for them in the connection. Once the statesmen of the Dominion might have regarded separating from the Empire as sacrificing protection that they needed. Now, if any duty remains, it rests on Canada to help England. The child looks naturally to shelter and protection at the hands of a parent; when it grows up filial affection holds it true to its allegiance.

History can be searched in vain for a parallel to the relations, physical and political, between Canada and the United States. There has never been another such stretch of unguarded boundary between two countries, never two peoples living side by side for so long a period in entire harmony and good feeling. It is all the more remarkable when we consider that the two peoples are almost entirely alike in everything except that one of them cherishes a sentimental allegiance to the British crown. A stranger alighting from the air in a town in New York or Ontario would need to inquire in which he had landed. For the houses, the people and the modes of life are identical.—Youth's Companion.

Memorial to Gen. Botha.

DURBAN, South Africa, July 16.—When unveiling the statue of the late Gen. Botha Saturday in the presence of the Governor-General, Prince Arthur of Connaught, and Princess Arthur of Connaught and many other prominent persons, Gen. Smuts, Premier of South Africa, said that he thought how significant it was that the first Botha monument should be erected by the American speaking residents of Durban, within a mile or two of the spot where the first shot was fired in the century long Anglo-Boer struggle, where the first was a general truce.

Premier Smuts paid tribute to Both as the chief architect of the Union, and said it was because Botha wanted to prevent one to his vision of a united South Africa that in 1914 he fought against his own people, including many of his former comrades.

"If you will wait until I hew this yew I will go with you anywhere in Europe to look for your ewes," said Hugh."

The New OVERLAND Blue Bird

Has won Immediate Public Favor

Never before in Canada has a car had such a reception. The Blue Bird has stepped into immediate popularity—and rightly.

For this new Overland is not only the most satisfactory car ever produced—but we believe it represents value that nothing on wheels can approach.

Powered with the same motor that won such fame for the Overlands of last year, the new car is much roomier—with 106-inch wheel base and ample legroom.

The doors are full 23 inches in width, the seats are wide; the cushions deep; the appointments rich and complete in every detail; cord tires all round; barrel headlights. The ingenious Triplex Springs kill jolt, bounce and side sway.

Finished in the most beautiful and distinctive of shades, Blue Bird Blue.

THE GREAT SHADOW

By

A. CONAN DOYLE

Author of "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes"

Copyright by A. Conan Doyle.

Now that we stood it was a sight now that was worth coming over the seas to see. On our own ridge was the checker of red and blue, stretching right away to a village over two miles from us. It was whispered from man to man in the ranks, however, that there was too much of the blue and too little of the red, for the Belgians had shown on the day before that they hearts were too soft for the work, and we had twenty thousand of them for comrades. Then even our British troops were half made up of militia men and reserves, for the pick of the old Peninsula regiments were on the ocean in transports, coming back from some fool's errand with our kinsfolk of America. But for all that we could see the bearskins of the Guards, the strong brigades of them, and the bonnets of the Highlanders, and the blue of the old German legion, and the red lines of Pack's brigade, and Kempt's brigade, and the green jackets of the men in front; and we knew that, some what might, these were men who would bide where they were placed, and that they had a man to lead them who would place them where they should bide.

Of the French we had seen little save the twinkle of their fires and a few horsemen here and there on the curves of the ridge; but as we stood and waited there came suddenly a grand blare from their bands, and their whole army came flooding over the top left which had hid them—bri- gade after brigade, and battalion after division, until the broad slope in its whole length and depth was blue with their uniforms and bright with the glint of their weapons. It seemed that they would never have done, still pouring over and pouring over, while our men leaned on their muskets and smoked their pipes, looking down at this grand gathering and listening to what the officers, who had fought the French before, had to say about them. Then, when the infantry had formed in long, deep masses, their guns came whirling and bounding down the slope, and it was pretty to see how smartly they unlimbered and were ready for action. And then, at a stately trot, down came the cavalry—thirty regiments at the least, with plume and breastplate and flashing sword and fluttering lance—forming up at the flanks and rear in long, shifting, glimmering lines.

"Them's the chaps," cried our old sergeant. "They're gluttons to fight, they are, and when you see their regiments with the great high hats in the middle, a bit behind the farm? That's the Guard—twenty thousand of them, my sons, and all picked men—gray-headed devils that have done nothing but fight since they were as high as my gaiters. They've three men to our two, and two guns to one, and by gad! they'll make you recruities wish you were back in Argyle street before they have finished with you." He was not a cheering man, our sergeant, but then he had been in every fight since Corunna, and had a medal with seven clasps upon his breast, so that he had a right to talk in his own fashion.

When the Frenchmen had arranged themselves just out of cannon shot we saw a small group of horsemen, all in a blaze with silver and scarlet and gold, ride swiftly between the divisions; and as they went a roar of cheering burst out from either side of them, and we could see arms outstretched to them and hands waving. An instant later the men had ridden away and the two armies stood facing each other in absolute deadly silence—a sight which often comes back to me in my dreams. Then of a sudden there was a flash among the men just in front of us, a thin column wheeled off from the dense line clump, and came swinging up toward the farm house which lay below us. It had not taken fifty paces before a gun banged out from an English battery on our left and the battle of Waterloo had begun.

It is not for me to tell you the story of that battle, and indeed I should have kept long enough away from such a thing had it not happened that our own fates—those of the three simple folk who came from the border country—were all just as much mixed up in it as those of any king or emperor of them all. To tell the honest truth, I have learned more about that battle from what I have read than from what I saw, for how much could I see with a comrade on each side, and a great white cloud bank at the very end of my firelock? It was from books and the talk of others that I learned how the heavy cavalry charged, how they rode over the faceless cuirassiers, and how they went out to the guns which they could get back. From them, too, I learned all about the successive assaults, and how the Belgians did, and how Pack and Kempt stood firm. But of my own knowledge I can only speak of what we saw during that long day in the rifts of the smoke and the lulls of the firing, and it's just of that that I will tell you.

We were on the right of the line and in reserve, for the Duke was afraid that Bonny might work round on that side and get at him from behind, so our three regiments, with another British brigade and the Hanoverians, were placed there to be ready for anything. There were two brigades of light cavalry, too, but the French attack was all from the front, so it was late in the day before we were really wanted.

The English battery which fired the first gun was still banging away on our left, and a German one was hard at work upon our right, so that we were wrapped round with the smoke, but we were not so hidden as to screen us from a line of French guns opposite, for a score of round shot came pipping through the air and plumped right into the heart of us. As I heard the scream of them and heard my rear man send word down like a diver, but our sergeant gave me a prod in the back with the handle of his halbert.

"Don't be so blasted polite," said he. "When you're hit you can bow once and for all."

There was one of those balls that knocked five men into a bloody mash, and I saw it lying on the ground afterwards, like a cricket ball. Another one went through the adjutant's horse with a plop, like a stone in the mud, broke its back and left it lying like a burst gooseberry. Three more fell farther to the right, but by the stir and cries we could tell that they had all told.

"Ah, James, you've lost a good mount," says Major Reed, just in front of me, looking down at the adjutant, whose boots and breeches were all running with blood.

"I gave a cool fifty for him in Glasgow," said the other. "Don't you think, major, that the men had better lie down, now that the guns have got our range?"

"Tut!" said the other. "They are young, James, and it will do them good."

"They'll get enough of it before the day's done," grumbled the other, but at that moment Colonel Reynell saw that the Rifles and the Fifty-second were down on either side of us, so we had the order to stretch ourselves out too. Precious glad we were when we could hear the shot whining like hungry dogs within a few feet of our backs. Then now a thud and a plump every minute or so, with a yelp of pain and a drumming of hoofs upon the ground, told us that we were still losing heavily.

A fine rain was falling and the damp air held the smoke low, so that we could only catch glimpses of what was doing just in front of us, though the roar of the guns told us that the battle was general all along the lines. Four hundred of them were all crashing at once now, and the noise was enough to split the drums of one's ears. Indeed, there was not one of us but had a singing in his head for many a long day afterward. Just opposite us, on the slope of a hill, was a French gun, and we could see the gray-green color quite plainly. They were small, active men with very tight breeches and high hats with great, straight plumes sticking up from them, but they worked like sheep shearers, rammed and sponged and trained. There were fourteen when I saw them first, and only four left standing at the last, but they were working away just as hard as ever.

The line that they called Hougoumont was down in front of us, and all morning we could see that a terrible fight was going on there, for the walls and the windows and the orchard hedges were all ablaze with flame, and there rose such shrieking and crying from it as I never heard before. It was half burned down, and shattered with balls, and ten thousand men were hammering at the gates, but a hundred guardsmen held it in the morning, and two hundred held it in the evening, and no French foot was ever set within its threshold. But how they fought, those Frenchmen! Their lives were no more to them than the mud under their feet. There was one—I can see him now—a stoutish, ruddy man on a crutch. He hobbled up alone in a lull of the firing to the side gate of Hougoumont, and he beat upon it, screaming to his men to come after him. For five minutes he stood there, strolling about in front of the gun-barrels which spared him, but at last a Brunswick rifleman in the orchard flicked out his brain with a rifle-shot. And he was only one of many, for all day, when they did not come in masses they came in twos and threes, with as brave a face as if the whole army was at their backs.

So we lay all morning looking down at the fight at Hougoumont; but soon the Duke saw that there was nothing to fear upon his right, and so he began to ride up and down behind us. The French had pushed their skirmishers past the farm, and they lay among the young corn in front of us, popping at the gunners, so that three pieces out of six on our left were lying with their men strewed in front of all round them. But the Duke had his eyes everywhere, and up he galloped at that moment, a thin, dark, wiry man, with very bright eyes, a hooked nose, and a big cockade on his cap. There were a dozen officers at his heels, all as merry as if it were a fox-hunt; but of the dozen there was not one left in the evening.

"Warm work, Adams," said he as he rode up.

"Very warm, your grace," said our general.

"But we can outstay them at it, I think! Tut! tut! we cannot let all-brushes silence our battery. Have these fellows out of that, Adams."

Then first I knew what a devil's thrill runs through a man when he is given a bit of fighting to do. Up to now we had just stood and been killed, which is the weariest kind of work. Now it was our turn, and, my word, we were ready for it. Up we jumped, the whole brigade, in a four-deep line, and rushed at the cornfield as hard as we could tear. The skirmishers snapped us as we came, and then away they bolted like corn-crakes, their heads down, their backs rounded, and their muskets at the trail. Half of them got away, but we caught up the others, the officer first, for he was a very fat man who could not run fast. It gave me quite a turn when I saw Rob Stewart on my right stick his bayonet into the man's broad back and heard him howl like a lost soul. There was no quarter in that field, and it was butt or point for all of them. The men's blood was aflame, and little wonder, for those wasps had been stinging all morning without our being able so much as see them.

And now, as we broke through the farther edge of the cornfield we got in front of the smoke, and there was the whole French army in position before us, with only two meadows and a narrow lane between us. As I heard a yell as we saw them, and away we should have gone, slap at them. If we had been left to ourselves, for silly young soldiers never think, but only run come to them until it is there in their midst. But the Duke had centered his horse beside us as we advanced, and now he roared something at the general, and the order came to halt and dress our line, holding our their arms for us to stop. There was a blowing of bugles, a pushing and a shoving, with the sergeants cursing and digging us with their halberts, and in less time than it takes me to write it there was the brigade in three neat little squares, all bristling with bayonets and in echelon, as they call it, so that each could fire across the face of the other.

It was the saving of us, as even so young a soldier as I was could very easily see. And we had none too much time, either. There was a low, grassy hill in our own front, and from behind this there came a sound like nothing on this earth so much as the beat of the waves on Berwick coast when the wind blows from the east. The earth was all shaking with that dull, rousing sound, and the air was full of it. "Steady, Seventy-first, for God's sake, steady!" shrieked the voice of our colonel behind us, but in front was nothing but the green, empty slope of the ridge, all mottled with daisies and dandelion.

And then suddenly, over the curve, we saw eight hundred brass helmets rise up, all in a moment, each with a long tag of horsehair flying from its crest, and then eight hundred fierce brown faces, all pushed forward, and glaring out from between the ears of as many horses. There was an instant of gleaming breast-plates, waving manes, tossing manes, fierce nostrils opening and shutting, and hoofs pawing the air before us, and then down came the line of muskets, and our bullets smacked up against their armor like the clatter of a hailstorm upon a window. I fired with the rest, and then rammed down another charge as fast as I could, staring out through the smoke in front of me, where I could see some long, thin thing, which flapped slowly backward and forward. A bugle sounded for us to cease firing, and a whiff of wind came to clear the curtain from in front of us, and then we could see what had happened.

I had expected to find half that regiment of horse lying on the ground; but whether it was that their breastplates had shielded them, or whether, being young and a little shaken at their coming, we had fired high, our volley had done very great harm. About thirty horses lay about, three of them together within ten yards of me, the middle one right on its back, with its four legs in the air, and it was one of these that I had seen flapping through the smoke. Then there were eight or ten dead men, and about as many wounded, sitting dazedly on the grass for the most part, though one was shouting "Vive l'Empereur!" at the top of his voice. Another fellow who had been shot in the thigh—a great, black-mustached chap he was, too—leaned his back against his dead horse, and, picking up his carbine, fired as coolly as if he had been shooting for a prize, and hit Angus Myres, who was only two feet from me, right through the forehead. Then he out with his hand to get another carbine that lay near, but before he could reach it big Hodgson, who was the pivot-man of the grenadier company, ran out, and passed his bayonet through his throat, which was a pity, for he seemed to be a very fine man.

At first I thought that the cuirassiers had run away in the smoke, but they were not men who did that very easily. Their horses had swerved at our volley, and they had raced past our square and taken the fire of the two other ones beyond, and then they broke through a hedge, and coming on a regiment of Hanoverians who were in line, they treated them as they would have treated us if we had not been so quick, and cut them to pieces in an instant. It was dreadful to see the big Germans running and screaming, while the cuirassiers stood up in their stirrups to have a better sweep for their long, heavy swords, and cut and stabbed without mercy. I do not believe that a hundred men of that regiment were left alive, and the Frenchmen came back across our front, shouting at us and waving their weapons, which were crimson down to the hilts. This they did to draw our fire, but the colonel was too old a soldier, for we could have done little harm at the distance, and they would have been among us before we could reload.

These horsemen got behind the ridge on our right again, and we knew very well that if we opened up from the squares they would be down upon us in a twinkle. On the other hand, it was hard to bide as we were, for they had passed the word to a battery of twelve guns which formed up a few hundred yards away from the left wing of our right, sending their balls just over the brow and down into the midst of us, which is called a plunging fire. And one of their gunners ran up to the top of the slope and stuck a handspike into the wet earth, to give them a guide, under the very muzzles of the whole brigade, none of whom fired a shot at him, each leaving him to the other. Ensign Samson, who was the youngest subaltern in the regiment, ran out from the square and pulled down the handspike, but quick as a jack after a minnow a lancer came flying over the ridge, and he made such a throw from behind that not only his point but his pennon, too, came out between the second and third buttons of the lad's tunic. "Helen! Helen!" he shouted, and fell dead on his face, while the lancer, blown half to pieces with the balls, toppled over beside him, still holding on to his weapon, so they lay together with that dreadful bond still connecting them.

But when the battery opened there was no time for us to think of anything except to square is a very easy way of meeting a horseman, but there is no worse one of taking a cannonball, so we soon learned when they began to cut red seams through us, until our ears were weary of the shouts and yells when hard iron met living flesh and blood. After ten minutes of it we moved our square a hundred paces to the right, but we left another square behind us, for a hundred and twenty men and seven officers showed where we had been standing. Then the guns found us again, and we tried to open out into line, but in an instant the horsemen—lancers they were this time—were upon us from over the brow. I tell you we were glad to hear the thud of their hoofs, for we knew that that must stop the cannon for a minute, and give us a chance of hitting back. And we hit back pretty hard, too, that time, for we were cold and vicious and savage, and I, for one, felt that I cared no more for the horsemen than if they had been so many sheep on Corriemuir. One gets just that chill or thinking, and one's own skin after a while, and you just feel that you want to make some one pay for all you have gone through. We took our change out of the lancers that time, for into the air we threw plates to shield them, and we cleared seventy of them out of their saddles at a volley. Maybe if we could have seen seventy mothers weeping for their lads we should not have felt so pleased over it, but then men are just brutes when they are fighting, and have as much thought as two bull-pups when they've got one another by the throttle.

Then the colonel did a wise stroke, for he reckoned that this would stave off the cavalry for five minutes, so he wheeled us into line and got us back into a deeper hollow, out of reach of the guns, before they could open again. This gave us time to breathe, and we wanted it, too, for the regiment had been melting away like an icicle in the sun. Seven men as it was for us, it was a deal worse for some of the others. The whole of the Dublin Fusiliers were cut off by this time-better shelter, fifteen thousand of them, and there were great gaps left in our line, through which the French cavalry rode as pleased them best. Then the French guns had been too many and too good for ours, and our heavy horse had been cut to bits, so things were going none too merry with us. On the other hand, Hougoumont, a blood-sonked ruin, was still ours, and every British regiment was firm, though, to tell the honest truth, as a man is bound to do, there were a sprinkling of red coats among the blue ones who made for the rear. But these were lads and stragglers, the faint-hearts that are found everywhere, and I say again that no regiment flinched. It was little we could see of the battle, but a man would be blind not to know that all the fields behind us were covered with flying men. But then, though we on the right did the bleeding of it, the Prussians had begun to show, and Napoleon had set twenty thousand of his men to face them, which made up for ours that had bolted, and left us much as we began. That was all right to us, however, and there came a time when the French horsemen had flooded in between us and the rest of the army, that we thought we were the only brigade left standing, and had set our teeth with the intention of selling our lives as dearly as we could.

At that time it was between four and five in the afternoon, and we had had nothing to eat, the most of us, since the night before, and were choked with rain into the bargain. It had drizzled off and on all day, but for the last few hours we had not had a thought to spare either upon the weather or our hunger. Now we began to look around and tighten our waistbelts, and ask who was hit, and who was spared. I was glad to see Jim, with his face all blackened with powder, standing on my right rear, leaning on his fire-lock. He saw me looking at him, and shouted out to know if I were hurt.

"All right, Jim," I answered.

"I fear I'm here on a wild-goose chase," said he gloomily, "but it's not over yet. By God, I'll have him or he'll have me!" He had brooded so much on his wrong, had poor Jim, that I really believe it had turned his head, for he had a glare in his eyes as he spoke that was hardly human. He was always a man that took events a bit too much to heart, and since Eddie had left him I am sure that he was no longer his own master.

It was at this time that we saw two single fights which they tell me were common enough in the battles of old, when men were trained in masses. As we lay in the hollow, two horsemen came spurring along the ridge in front of us, riding as hard as hoof could rattle. The first was an English dragoon, his face right down on his horse's mane, with a French cuirassier, an old, gray-headed fellow, thundering behind him on a big, black mare. Our chaps set up a hooting as they came flying on, for it seemed a shame to see an Englishman run like that; but as they swept across our front we saw where the trouble lay. The dragoon had dropped his sword and was unarmed, while the other was pressing him so close that he could not get a wee on. At last, stung maybe by our hooting, he made up his mind to chance it. His eye fell on a lance beside a dead Frenchman, so he swerved his horse to let the other pass, and pulling off cleverly enough, he grasped hold of it. But the other was too tricky for him, and was on him like a shot. The dragoon thrust up with the lance, but the other turned and sliced him through the shoulder-blade. It was all done in an instant, and the Frenchman cantered his horse up the lane, showing his teeth at us over his shoulder like a snarling dog.

That was one to them, but we scored one for us presently. They had pushed forward a skirmish-line whose fire was toward the batteries on our right and left rather than on us, but we sent out two companies of the Ninety-fifth to drive them in. They had pushed strong to hear the crackling kind of noise that they made, for both sides were using the rifle. An officer stood among the French skirmishers, a tall, lean man with a mantle over his shoulders, and as our fellows came forward he sent out midway between the two parties and stood as a fencer would, with his sword up and his head back. I can see him now, with his lowered eyebrows and his sneer that he had upon his face. On this the subaltern of the Rifles, who was a fine well-grown lad, ran forward and drove full tilt at him with one of the queer crooked swords that the Rifles carry. They came together like two rams, for each ran at the other, and down they tumbled at the shock, but the French man was below. Our man broke his sword short off, and took the other's blade through his arm, but he was the better man, and he managed to let the life out of his enemy with the jagged stump of his blade. I thought that the French skirmishers would have shot him down, but not a trigger was drawn, and he got back to his company with the sword through his arm and half another in his hand

CHAPTER XIII.

The End of the Storm.

Of all the things that seem strange in that great battle, now that I look back upon it, there was nothing that was queerer than the way in which it acted on my comrades. For some took it as though it had been their daily meat, without question or change, and others pattered out prayers from the first gun-fire to the last, and others again cursed and swore in a way that was dreadful to hear. To me, though one, my own left-hand mate, Mike Threadingham, who kept telling about his maiden aunt, Sarah, and how she had left the money which had been promised him for a bounty to the children of drowned sailors. Again and again he told me this story, and yet when the battle was over, he took his oath that he had never opened his lips all day. As to me, I cannot say whether I prayed or not, but I know that my mind and my memory were clearer than I can ever remember them, and I was thinking all the time about the old folks at home, and about cousin Ellen and her soft, brown eyes, and De Lissae with his cat's whiskers, and all the doings at West Inch which had ended by bringing us here on the plains of Belgium as a cockshot for two hundred and fifty cannon.

During all this time the roaring of those guns had been something dreadful to listen to, but now they suddenly died away, though it was not for half an hour or so that we knew when one feels that a worse crash is coming hard at the fringe of it. There was still a mighty noise on the distant wing, where the Prussians were pushing their way onward, but the fire in front was all over. The other batteries, both French and English, were silent, and the smoke cleared so that the armies could see a little of each other. It was a dreary, sight upon our ridge, for there seemed to be just a few scattered knots of red, and the lines of green where the German legion stood, while the masses of the French appeared to be in bed by their battery, and of course, we knew that they must have lost many thousands in these attacks. We heard a great cheering and shouting from among them, and then suddenly all their batteries opened together with a roar which made the din of the earlier part seem nothing in comparison. It might well be twice as loud, for every battery was twice as near, being moved right up to the front rank, with huge masses of horse between and behind them to guard them from attack.

When that devil's roar burst upon our ears there was not a man down to the drummer-boys who did not understand what it meant. It was Napoleon's last great effort to crush us. There were but two more hours of light, and if we could hold our own for those, all would be well. Shrewd and weary and spent, we prayed that we might have strength to load and stab and fire while a man of us stood upon his feet.

His cannon could do us no great harm now, for we were on our faces, and in an instant we could turn into a huddle of bayonets if his horse came down again. But behind the thunder of the guns there arose a sharper, shriller noise, whirring and rattling, the wildest, jolliest, most stirring kind of sound.

"It's the end-de-charge!" cried an officer. "They mean business this time."

And as he spoke we saw a strange thing. A Frenchman, dressed as an officer of hussars, came galloping toward us on a little bay horse. He was screeching "Vive le Roi! Vive le Roi!" at the pitch of his lungs, which was as much as to say that he was a deserter, since we were for the king and they for the emperor. As he passed us he roared out in English: "The Guard is coming! The Guard is coming!" and so vanished away to the rear like a leaf blown before a storm. At the same instant up there rode an side-de-camp with the reddest face that ever I saw upon mortal man.

"You must stop 'em, or we are done," he cried to General Adams, so that all our company could hear him.

"How is it going?" asked the general.

"Two weak squadrons left out of six regiments of heavies," said he, and he spoke as a man whose nerves are overstrung.

"Perhaps you would care to join in our advance. Pray consider yourself quite one of us," said the general, bowing and smiling as if he were asking him to a dish of tea.

"I shall have much pleasure," said the other, taking off his hat, and a moment afterward our three regiments closed up and the brigade advanced in four lines over the hollow where we had lain in square, and out beyond the point whence we had seen the French army.

There was little of it to be seen now, only the red belching of the guns flashing quickly out of the cloud-bank, and the black figures, stooping, straining, mopping, sponging, working like devils and at devilish work. But through the cloud that rattle and whir rose louder and louder, with a deep-mouthed shouting and the stamping of thousands of feet. Then there came a broad black blur through the haze, which darkened and darkened, until it stood out as the head of a great serpent abreast, marching swiftly toward us, with high fur hats upon their heads and a gleam of brasswork over their brows. And behind that hundred came another hundred, and behind that another hundred, all rolling and writhing out of the cannon-smoke, like a monstrous snake, until there seemed to be no end to the mighty column. In front ran a spray of skirmishers and behind them the drummers, and up they came—near at a kind of tripping step, with the officers clustering thickly at the sides and waving their swords and cheering. There were a dozen mounted men, too, at their front, all shouting together, and one with his hat held off upon the sword-point. I say again that no men upon this earth could have fought more manfully than the French did upon that day.

It was wonderful to see them, for, as they came on, the guns, they got rid of their own guns, so that they had no longer any help from them, while they got in front of the two batteries which had been on either side of us all day, and their own gun had their range to a foot, and we saw long red lines scored right down the dark column as it advanced. So near were they, and so closely did they march, that every shot plowed through ten files of them, and as they closed up and came on with a swing and dash that was fine to see. Their head was turned straight for ourselves, while the Ninety-fifth overlapped them on one side and the Fifty-second on the other.

I shall always think that, if we had waited so, the Guard would have broken us, for how could a four-deep line stand against such a column? But at that moment Colbourne, the colonel of the Fifty-second, gave the right flank ground so as to bring it on the side of the column, which brought the Frenchmen to a halt. Their front line was fairly piped from us at the moment, and it had a good look at them. It was funny to me to remember that I had always thought of Frenchmen as small men, for there was not one of that fine company who could not have picked me up as if I had been a child and cleft their hats inside them lock rather yet. They were hard, wizened, wiry fellows, too, with fierce, puckered eyes and bristling mustaches—old soldiers who had fought and fought week in week out for many a year. And then, as I stood with a finger upon the trigger, waiting for the word to fire my eye fell upon the mounted officer, with his hat upon his sword, and I saw that it was De Lissae.

I saw it, and Jim did, too. I heard a shout, and saw him rush forward madly at the French column. And, as quick as a thought, the whole brigade rode their one from him, officers and all, and a thing threatened upon the Guard in front, while our comrades charged them on the flanks. We had been waiting for the order, and they all thought now that it had been given, but, you may take my word for it, Jim Horscroft was the real leader of the brigade when we charged the Old Guard.

Waterspout Wonders.

A remarkable experience recently befell the crew of the steamship Carston, off Guantanamo, Cuba.

One afternoon the vessel was caught in a tropical thunderstorm, which lasted for about three-quarters of an hour. Then the wind dropped suddenly and the low clouds began to send down a number of long, tapering arms towards the water.

These arms were constantly changing their shape and size. Sometimes some of the smaller ones would revolve rapidly round a larger one. All were apparently at an almost incredible speed. When a larger spout was formed it would absorb all the smaller ones around it. On one occasion no fewer than nine waterspouts were visible at the same moment.

Waterspouts are fairly common in the course of the Gulf Stream, and one is occasionally seen round the British coast. But to encounter them in such numbers is an almost unheard-of occurrence.

They are caused by small swirls of air, which are brought about by conflicting currents in the atmosphere. These swirls suck up the water from the sea, sometimes in the form of spray, but more often in the form of a great whirling column of solid water. As the spout reaches the clouds, which are always low at such a time, it spreads out and breaks into drops, which are scattered through the body of the clouds.

Oldest Dress in Europe.

What must be the oldest garment in Europe has just been found in Sweden. Some peat cutters were at work in Gerum Fen, near Skara, when they discovered a voluminous cloak just a few feet under the surface of the peat. The preserving qualities of the ten water had kept it intact since the bronze age, about a thousand years before the Christian era. Several noted professors have examined the cloak and all agree as to its antiquity. The state geologist of Sweden, Dr. L. ven Post, has no doubt as to its age. Prices of material handwoven in the same period from the museum of the British Museum. These were taken from the Swiss lake dwellings, and the officials in charge of the bronze age department say there is no reason why the new find should not be perfectly genuine. It is thought that the peat areas of Ireland probably cover and preserve much that would throw a great deal of light upon the little-known race of the bronze age period of Northern Europe.

SEED DRILL AND PLOW

How to Properly Care for These Useful Implements.

Watch the Bearings and Attend to Oilins—Cover the Plow's Bright Parts With Thick Oil or Grease—How to Tell the Bushels of Grain in a Bin—"Holding Up" Milk.

(Contributed by Ontario Department of Agriculture, Toronto.)

The seed drill shows the result of neglect in a way so impressively as to deter the owner or operator from abusing this machine to the same extent as he may practice with the plow or harrow. A warped seed box, of rusty and clogged grain runs, leave tell tale evidence over the field that even makesthe neglectfulman repent. With many moving parts, the drill requires frequent careful oiling. Disc and double disc drills have many more moving parts than the shoe or hoe type of drill, and with the disc bearings subjected to dust and sand, considerable trouble will develop if there is any neglect to keep the bearings properly adjusted and oiled. When once the bearings become worn, it is impossible for the disc to function properly and renewal of the parts that have become worn is the only remedy if the drill is to give best service. All bearings should receive attention and beksptsmooth and free from grit. This is best done by a frequent application of light mineral oil. The grain drill bearings are not the easiest to get at; a long flexible steel oil can is generally the most useful type of otter.

Keep the Oil Can Constantly at Hand.

An oil can should always be with the seed drill. The large wheels turning slowly may not need oiling more than once each half day, but the discs may turn 15,000 times in a day under considerable pressure, hence the need of frequent oiling. The seed box mechanism turning slowly can generally be well served by oiling twice a day. The grain drill should not be exposed to the weather when not in use. A canvas cover sufficiently large to fully protect the grain box should go with this machine for use over night or idle periods if it is not desired to move the drill back to its proper storage in the implement shed until the close of the seeding season. The matter of keeping bolts tight and everything in adjustment is just as important with this machine as with any other. If the drill gets proper care, it will last the lifetime of the operator, and the original cost of paint will carry it through.

When the plow is not in use its bright surfaces should be protected by a layer of thick mineral oil or grease. Heavy machine oil or good cake grease rubbed over the mould board, share, coulter and jointer point will save a plow from the ravages of rust. The rusting of one winter period may injure a plow more than a long season's service in the field. Rusty plows lose a lot of time for man and team in the spring, although delay caused by nails to clear and scrape a mould board that will not scour. All braces and bolts should be kept tight, the points of share, coulter and skimmer sharp and of proper shape. The plow wheel and axle should also be well lubricated and packed in such a way as will prevent sand reaching the wearing surfaces of wheel hub or axle. The small wheel of a plow will turn 40,000 times in a day plowing two acres. If the wheel is to last and do good service, the axle should get a little heavy oil every day. An oil can holder should be attached to every plow, so that the oil supply will always be at hand and screeching prevented by the timely use of

Watch the Plow Point.

If the plow point becomes worn the inclination of the mouldboard is changed; the plow tends to run on the point, the work becomes heavier on both the horses and the plowman, and poorer work is done. The heel of the share wears nearly as quickly as does the point. With the dulling of the heel the plow will wing over to the land and require more exertion on the part of both horses and man. Keep the plowshare sharp and in proper form. A coat of paint applied to the handles, beam and all other parts that do not come in direct contact with the oil will do much to keep up appearances and prevent weathering.—L. Stevenson, Sec., Dept. of Agriculture.

Bushels of Grain in Bins.

To compute the number of bushels in bins multiply the length by width and depth, and divide the number obtained by 1.25. This gives the number of bushels.

If figuring on ear corn, divide by 2½ instead of 1¼ as for small grain or shelled corn.

A common farm waggon box, 10 feet long and 3 feet wide, will hold about 2 bushels of grain for every inch in depth, that is, a box 15 inches deep will hold approximately 36 bushels.

When Cow "Holds Up" Milk.

The suppression of secretion of milk is the reflex result of irritation of the nervous system. Shock, chill, fright, pain, rough milking, sensitive teats, weaning of a calf, etc., are some of the causes. If possible have the cow milked by a woman. Try the effects of placing a young calf at her head before starting to milk. Massage the udder gently for a few minutes before milking. If the teats are sore, dar applysome melted lard each evening. An old-fashioned treatment is to lay a sack of grain on the cow's loins at milking time. This is expected to detract her attention so that she will "let down her milk." We cannot vouch for the efficiency of this plan as we have not tried it in practice. In stubborn cases it is best to let a calf nurse.

Elephants Once Roamed Britain.

Through what appears to have been a mere chance part of a tusk and some teeth of one of the largest species of British elephants were recently saved from an untimely end. Some laborers digging gravel for the paths of a new kitchen garden in the Deer Park of Magdalen College, Oxford, came across the relics, that is to say, lying in untouched terrace-gravel about four to six feet below the surface of the soil. A casual onlooker ventured to doubt whether the first tusk found was ivory. In reply the digger said: "Of course you know that it is ivory," and he immediately proceeded to prove his point by driving his pick into the tusk, breaking it up to make many pieces. Fortunately, attention was drawn to the site before the whole of the other tusk had shared the same fate, four molar teeth being found close by. The parts of the tusk that was rescued now constitutes a memorial to one of the earliest recorded inhabitants of the college site and is on exhibition in the college library.

Ancient Walls of Tiberias.

Part of an ancient wall and columns belonging to the ancient city of Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee, have been recently recovered. As soon as the ruins were discovered expert archaeologists will be carried out under scientific control. It was on this city that the Sermon on the Mount was preached, and Mary Magdalene is believed to have come from

THERE were 1021 forest fires reported in Ontario last season. The vigilance of the fire rangers kept 53 per cent. of these down to a size not exceeding five acres. But yet the total area burned was over 346,000 acres—equal to a strip of forest one mile wide from Toronto to Cochrane.

Of the total number, only 52 were lightning fires. In other words, out of every 100 fires, 59 fires were due to man's carelessness and were preventable.

Accordingly, the problem of forest protection in Ontario calls for the co-operation of the whole citizenship of the Province. If reasonable care be exercised by everyone in the woods to prevent the start of fire, our forests will be safe. Railway officials, campers, prospectors, lumber firms, settlers, construction firms—all can help by being careful of fire in the woods, and by joining hands with the press, the leaders of public opinion, and the business men of Ontario, in prompting educational propaganda to reduce forest fires.

ROMANCE OF HOLLINGER

$75 AND PROSPECTOR'S LUCK LED TO FORTUNE.

Penniless Youth Struck It Rich at First Try, Opening Way to Canada's Richest Gold Mine, and Half First Price Went to Man Who Grubstaked Him.

Back of the biggest gold mine in Canada is the story of a boy who went "broke," a bartender who grubstaked him for another try, and a lucky strike which made both of them rich beyond all their hopes. But between the time of the loan of $75 and word of the strike the bartender repented and sold a half interest to another man for the price he had paid—$75. Thus the bartender covered his own risk, but had to give up a half share when thegold was found. Since then the Hollinger gold mines in the Porcupine district of Northern Ontario have yielded $50,000,000 and are running at the rate of a million a month. About one-half is profit. The mines have $40,000,00 in sight, and their total resources have been estimated at $450,000,000, one of the greatest properties in the world.

In 1909 Benny Hollinger was drifting around the silver workings in the Cobalt district of Canada. He had been down and out for some time and the prospects were no better. Then word trickled in of gold outcroppings in a far-away place called Porcupine. The report persisted, and Hollinger caught fire from this new opportunity. Opportunity was one thing and the ways and means another. That was where Jack McMahon stepped into the story. We may imagine Hollinger leaning over McMahon's bar whispering, between customers, what he would like to do. It is not hard to fancy McMahon catching his enthusiasm, laying aside his bar towel, and peeling off $75 from the treasury in his pocket.

Hollinger fell in with another young prospector, just as he might have done in a movie plot, and they determined to put fortunes to the test together. Hollinger was twenty-four and his side partner, Alex. Gillies, about the same age. They struck Porcupine, and cast around for claims. A great many had been staked out, covering every foot of ground in the most likely places where pay dirt was first found. One veteran prospector, a certain Bill Davidson, took a fancy to the youths and told them that they might find ground worth examining some miles away, near other claims he had staked. Away went the pair and they were not long in locating the quartz veins which Davidson had told them about. They decided that the promising ground represented about twelve claims and tossed a coin to see who would take the six to the west or the six to the east. Hollinger got those on the western side of the outcroppings. Then he thought about a friend back in Cobalt for whom he had promised to stake a claim if he found anything worth while. This claim also was staked, in the name of Barney McEnaney. After that the prospectors went to work. Almost the first stroke of a pick showed Hollinger that the quartz was rich. As he uncovered the veins even his inexperienced eye saw that great wealth lay before him.

It was on Oct. 6, 1909, that his big strike came and he promptly hurried away with nuggets of rare value. Just to show the fickleness of fortune, there was a rusty prospector's forge, overgrown with weeds, near the spot where Hollinger hit it rich. Somebody else unsung to fame had worked over those same veins and passed on empty-handed.

By this time it was hard winter with the snow coming down and little could be done until spring. But word of Hollinger's find reached Alphonse Pare, mining engineer and representative of considerable interests. Pare asked to see Hollinger's samples and when his eye fell on the gold he packed Hollinger off to Porcupine as fast as the two could travel. It was getting on toward mid-winter and they had hard going. But on reaching the ground they found that unexpected rains had left a good part of the Hollinger claims uncovered. So the two turned in and tapped the veins again.

Pare signed up Hollinger then and there for a cash payment of $2,000, entitling his backers to examine his property and giving them an option to buy at $350,000 if they decided to take it. Hollinger and Pare came back to Cobalt, both well satisfied. An offer was made Hollinger to give him a twelfth interest in the company when formed to work his claims, along with a cash payment. He declined and took the cash. If he had decided the other way his share would have run into millions, but he never complained.

Five partners shared in the company to work the Hollinger properties. There were two Timmins brothers, two McMartin brothers and D. A. Dunlap, all of the Cobalt region. They paid the purchase price, but lacked money to begin operations on the desired scale after such a big outlay. They sold stock at $3.35 a share in a limited amount. Seventy per cent. of the capital still is in the hands of these pioneers or their heirs. Dividends are around $6,000 a day.

In the meantime Hollinger had settled his old folk comfortably and got married. But the gold craving returned. He took to the trail again and staked claims not far from those he had sold so well. The ground appeared to have characteristics in common with the other site. Thus the Hollinger Reserve came into existence and he started mining. This took capital, and, according to some versions, Hollinger was in a fair way to lose what he had gained. A stock-selling campaign failed to pan out, and finally the property went up at a sheriff's auction. The buyer was Barney McEnany, who had held his claim until he received $500,000 for it.

Collective Singing.

"Collective singing is a civilizing influence that must be restored," writes Mr. R. Machell in "The Theosophical Review."

"Collective listening to music is not the same; for an individual, in listening may easily forget the other listeners, and enjoy the pleasure selfishly whereas in collective singing there must be co-operation." And, as the voices blend in harmony or unison, something awakens in the hearts of the singers, as well as of the hearers; a bond of union is established, that is a permanent civilizing influence, as well as a temporary joy. And when very large bodies of people sing together there is born a spirit of enthusiasm that is an awakening power, releasing in the song the soul of the assembly.

"The song becomes what it originally was said to be, magic, that could evoke spiritual powers in man unconscious of the forces that lies latent in humanity. Those who have assisted at a Handel festival will have three thousand singers singing the 'Hallelujah' chorus, will understand the power of song to arouse unusual qualities as well as deep emotions. And similar results will be attained in smaller groups according to the quality and character of the association."

FROM THE HEBRIDES.

Canada's New Citizens Hail From a Stern Land.

Perhaps the Hebrides will yield more of their strudy citizens to Canada now that the ice has been broken by the parties who recently arrived. It is a stern land, backward in its development and stubborn in its soil. If the new citizens who have arrived in Ontario from Stornoway give a good account of the land others may follow.

Go inland from Stornoway and straightway you wonder no longer that men should go, writes a special correspondent to the Manchester Guardian who went to see the departure for Canada recently.

"Here are two pictures in my mind that are the complement and explanation of the liner lying among the islands filling up with those robust young men. The first is of a sky filled with clouds. A shaft of sunshine on which the desolate land rests up. It was a land black stony soil stretched in little patches of cultivation, scored through with cuttings where the peat had been lifted, and dotted with small cattle. Upon the skyline a man with a bright shirt was digging with a spade, a wild, picturesque illustration of the wrestle four nouishment from that lean nurse.

"The second is of a row of what are called black houses, one-story buildings of loose stones stuffed on the outside with turf, and thatched. A wisp of turf burns on the peat in a choking smoke. Upon the floor of trodden earth in the very middle of the room a peat fire was burning, filling the place with its pungent smell and causing one to peer closely about before anything could be distinguished. The small window could not be opened. There was no chimney, not even a hole in the roof. Above the fire a black kettle was hanging from a hook, and the chain that held it was festooned inches thick with peat soot. By the fire an old woman was crouched warming this hands. She was the last survivor of the emigrants. Fowl scratched about the place and a cow was stalled at the end of the room.

"The young men and women of the Hebrides have seen other modes of life than these. And so it comes about that while the old remain crouched over the peat and wrestle with the obstinate soil the youns are stepping briskly along the gangway setting their faces westward."

A Poet of Nature.

A Nova Scotia writer who passed away during the month of May, William B. Hamilton, though, perhaps, little known outside his native province, was the author of some fine poetry. With Mr. Marshall, as with so many others, the love of the Dominion writing was but an incident to a life busily occupied with other things. He was born at Liverpool, N.S., in 1859, was educated there and in 1881, and subsequently practiced law, chiefly at Bridgewater, until appointed in 1898 asRegistrar of Deeds for Lunenburg County. His one book, called "A Book of Verse," was published locally in 1909.

His most noted poem, "Brooklet," was published in the Rose Magazine, Montreal, and was a memorial verse for his friend, Robert R. McLeod, a Nova Scotian divinity student of Harvard University. This poem, which runs somewhat beyond 200 lines, touches lightly and picturesquely on the pioneers, as well as describing his friend and his love of nature. He wrote:

Ah, he was richly dowered of the earth!
The grain of sand, the daisy in the sod,
Awoke in his heart; and early he went forth,
Through field and wood, with young eyes all abroad;
And saw the nesting birds, and beck and nod
Of little creatures running wild and free,
Which knew not that they know, yet are of God!
And kept his youth and grew in sympathy.
And loved his fellows more, and had love's victory.

O Friend! who so didst joy of knowledge use
That men look up and brighten at thy name,
And speak of genius, and put by the new
To tell some good of one death cannot claim,
Nor life require to read in sculptured fame.
The wind upon the hill hath sweetest hush;
The day is melting into tenderest tone;
And from the valley, where the waters rush,
Comes up the evensong of the lone hermit-thrush.

Arresting an Eskimo.

More than 700 miles over arctic trails by a dog team and a further 125 miles by schooner was the trip made recently by Constable F. Stevenson, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in bring into Aklavik for trial an Eskimo prisoner charged with the murder of Corporal Doak and a storekeeper named Bindder.

Geography in Names.

Many things we use every day are named after the towns from which they originally came.

For instance, probably you have a pair of worsted socks, which were once made at Worstead, but which nowadays come principally from Huddersfield; or a Panama hat, which comes from Ecuador instead of the place from which it took its name. Cambric handkerchiefs are so-called from the town of Cambrai, in France.

Tweed suits, Inverness capes, and Leghorn hats are examples of the same thing. The connection between damsons and Damascus is not so obvious, but damson is really only a contraction for Damascene plum. Currants get their name from the fact that originally they were made from small grapes, which will grow near Corinth, in Greece; they were formerly called Corinthians.

Cherries came from the city of Cerasus, which once stood in Asia Minor, and chestnuts preserve the name of Castana, another city of the past, whence the trees first came to Europe.

The names of two cheeses, Cheddar and Stilton, come from two villages, one in Somerset and the other in Huntingdonshire.

Worcester, Sevres, Limoges, Dresden, and Delft have all given names to different kinds of china, and Delft, a small Dutch town, is remembered by Delft pottery.

AmericanPraise For Bonar Law

Bonar Law is one of those men whose merits are not fully appreciated until it is found necessary to appoint their successors. He was the very antithesis of his predecessor in office. The few months of his administration were long enough to impress the world with the quiet greatness that lurked in him. Woodrow Wilson's message to him is only typical of what American papers are saying. They could hardly be more sincerely regretful if they were taking leave of an American president in similar circumstances. They feel that they know Bonar Law as well as his own countrymen know him, and his qualities are as generously commented on this side of the Atlantic as on the other. the New York World says:

"Mr. Bonar Law did not stir men. He reassured them. He gave them no slogans, he gave them no policies, but he gave them confidence. His settled nothing of any great importance to Europe or to the empire, but somehow he managed by the force of his own personality example and a badly shaken faith in Parliamentary politics. For people care more about men than about measures, and they value transparent honesty and simplicity a great deal. Having dined continuously on caviare and cocktails the British people were more than ready for a little plain living."

This is the tribune paid him by the New York Tribune:

"It is a notable tribute to Bonar Law's statesmanship that his retirement excites as deep concern abroad as it does at home. When Lloyd George was forced out of office there was a sigh of relief. He had kept Europe in hot water." His passion for violent claim in diplomacy and his amazing inconsistencies had destroyed confidence in his leadership. Bonar Law came in with a program of tranquilization. And in the few months of his premiership Europe made more substantial progress toward political stability and recovery than was made, perhaps, during the whole post-treaty period of Georgian spectacularism.

"Bonar Law stood out as an embodiment of common-sense moderation. He was hampered in many ways by the foreign policy which he had inherited from his chief. But he combined to show good will. Bonar Law inspired faith because of his sincerity and steadfastness. After all, he was the only great statesman left in politics. The retiring Premier was gifted with the two sterling qualities of honesty and modesty. Lord Beaverbrook tells us that 'his curious combination of intellect and character' really sustained the Lloyd George government. When he laid down the burden of floor management in the House of Commons the coalition began to crack. . . Yet no drop of the bitter cup of office recently touched his lips so long as his chief was there to drain the flagon."

"Before the war leadership of this sort picked itself out. Now the world acclaims it and is honestly grieved when a statesman who displays it is oblised to drop the reins of power."

The New York Times says:

"Mr. Bonar Law's resignation, based on imperative reasons of health, evoked notes which had more than a personal significance. From his political opponents—all except Mr. Lloyd George—came expressions of heartfelt regret at his being compelled to lay down the Premiership after having held it for so short a time. He was never credited with an overweening political ambition such as has afflicted many English public men of his generation, yet his rise to the leadership of the Government was of a sort to satisfy the aspirations of any man. His promotion was won by substantial but not showy qualities. No one ever thought of him as a genius, but the country came to regard him as a leader at once sagacious and safe. When the taunt was flung at his Government that it was made up of men of 'second-class brains,' he quietly replied that he would not mind that, provided they had first-class character. He himself was generally believed to have it, and the loss of the high position which he gained owing to its fine sorrowful and even tragic personal aspects upon which it is needless to dwell."

The New York Herald is particularly warm in its regard for Mr. Bonar Law as the following extract attests:

"Bonar Law has never been a proud man or a selfish man; but decent ambition and profound respect for sound craftsmanship in politics have been prime animating motives in his life. Defeat of ambition because the tools of his craft have become broken or bent must strike deeper into his honest heart than into the hardened by pride and hardened by selfishness. Testimony to his personal worth is already ample from the lips of his own countrymen, political foes no less than political friends. Those without the borders of his country may well join in praise of virtues that are not limited by partisan lines or international borders, because they are human, universal virtues."

What other statesman when he passes from the political stage will receive from political opponents and foreign observers tokens of more sympathetic regard and admiration than those that have been tendered to Mr. Bonar Law on his retirement?

Airplanes for Week-End Trips.

PARIS, June 25.—At least a third of the pilots and passengers at the Aerial Week-End organized by the Aero Club de France, are women.

More than fifty planes came from England, Belgium and all parts of France, making the trip in two or three hours at the most. The women declare it is a much more comfortable way to travel than automobiles, especially as it dustless. They stepped out of their machines trim and ready for tea.

The Aero Club is pushing the idea that their route is the most convenient one for week-end trips.

MOTHER OF TWIN BOYS

Tells How Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Relieved Her of Inflammation and Great Weakness

West St. John, N. B.—"I was in a general run-down condition following the birth of my twin boys. I had a great deal of inflammation, with pains and weakness. My doctor recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. He said that your medicine would be the only thing to build me up. I am sure he is right, for I am feeling much better and am gaining in weight, having gone down to ninety-three pounds. I was in bed for over a month, but am up again now. I have recommended the Vegetable Compound to my sister-in-law and have given permission to use my letter."—Mrs. Alma Ritchie, 32 Rodney St., West St. John, N. B.

There are many women who find their household duties almost unbearable owing to some weakness or derangement. The trouble may be slight, yet cause such annoying symptoms as dragging pains, nervousness and headaches.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is a splendid medicine for such conditions. It has in many cases relieved the symptoms of the blues of a case of them. Mrs. Ritchie's experience is but one of many.

DRAMAS OF MYSTERY GOLD.

Some Get Unexpected Fortunes From Far-Off Relatives.

In an official list of unclaimed money appears the name of a certain lieutenant, who about forty years previously had deposited 20,000 rupees with the Indian Government.

An agent in London, Eng., found that he was the second son of a well-known K.C., and that he was among the victims of the Khyber Pass disaster in 1842. In the end the living representatives—four in number—of the settlement pleader ran to cracks. Two of them were domestic servants, one was rural postman, and the other was a cobbler in winter and a seaside preacher during summer months.

Some years ago inquiries were made for the next-of-kin of a wealthy brewer who had died intestate near Melbourne, Australia. Only a week before his death he has written to his two sons, who were living in humble circumstances in a Yorkshire town, and he had not heard of their father for a long period.

In consequence of his communication, they made certain investigations, and found claim of their father's death and of an interesting sequel.

A claim to the estate had been set up by a woman professing to be the dead man's widow. This had been opposed by the "widow's" daughter on the ground that her mother had told her that when her mother married the brewer her first husband was alive.

The "widow" denied this allegation, stating that it was made out merely to extort money, and that the daughter was a bigamist, as she had two "husbands" living. It was established, however, that when the first brewer "married" the "widow" his real wife was alive in England. As a result, the two sons in Yorkshire came into about $250,000 each.

Another remarkable intestate was a woman who in early life was transported to Australia for stealing her master's gold watch. She died at an advanced age, leaving a large fortune. A will was set up, but this was proved to be a forgery, and in the end her wealth went to her son, who was born in jail in Cork.

He, too, died intestate, and advertisements for his next-of-kin appeared for a long period before any notice was taken of them. At last several claimants came forward, and after evidence had been taken on commission in the United States, Canada, Newfoundland, and Ireland, the residue of deceased's estate, which amounted to $275,000, was divided amongst them.

In connection with other Colonial intestacies curious "finds" have been made in the Record Office. The Canadian Pacific Railway some years ago made a terminus on a certain spot in British Columbia. Curious as to the company's title to the land a Canadian agent called at the Record Office. There he found proof that the crown had granted such land to an early settler, some next-of-kin consequently benefited.

During a search for the heirs of another wealthy intestate who died in Australia, an agent leafed a leaf in the Record Office are kept the indictments in criminal cases covering a long period. He obtained permission to search them, and found a record of a conviction for poaching against the intestate. This gave him the name of the wrongdoer's native place, and the first heir was found.

The startling point of such disclosures is usually a list of intestates' estates. Most Colonial Governments issue such a list periodically, and in it there are frequently entries on which hang many a strange story.

Birds and There Nests.

The average time taken by a bird to build its nest is about a week; but if the first one be destroyed a second some may be built in a day. A few birds afflicted with chronic laziness do no more than repair an old nest of last year. Immediately after the nest has been built, or laying begins, usually at the rate of one a day laid about the same time. Eggs laid in dark holes, like those of the woodpeckers and kingfishers, are always white so that they can been seen by the bird entering the nest. Eggs, however, are all colors. Often, contrary to popular opinion, the coloring is not at all protective. The number of eggs laid increases with the amount of attention they are exposed. Sea birds nesting on the inaccessible cliffs lay only one egg; water-fowl ten to twenty. The usual number is three to five. Incubation usually begins with the laying of the first egg. Owls, however, begin when the last egg has been laid. Robins egg requires fourteen days' incubation, ducks twenty-seven, geese thirty-five. In all cases during this period the eggs have to be constantly turned and moistened. Usually incubation is the work of the female alone, but the male sparrow is peculiar in that he sinks his dignity—and does his share.

The best baseball game of the season was played at the Driving Park Wednesday afternoon of last week, the teams being the Circle Six, of Kingston, vs. Napanee. Both pitchers, Loucks for Napanee, and Purvis for Kingston, pitched gilt-edged ball. The batting teams, however, had one bad innings each, due to careless fielding, and it was in these two innings that the games were scored. Mr. Culchane of Toronto, refereed to the entire satisfaction of all. The batteries were Purvis and Richards for Kingston and Loucks and Loucks for Napanee. The score was 7-5 in favor of the Circle Six team.
